

Typically, Medicare for assisted living extends to some portion of outpatient expenses following a hospital visit. If an elderly person living in California suffers a slip and fall accident, he or she will most likely qualify for hospital care and the coverage of medications under Medicare. However, Medicare for assisted living means the senior can receive necessary house-calls from a physician but must pay the deductible and some percentage of the fee for the visit. Additionally, the cost for the constant attention of an at-home caregiver can become quite expensive, creating a financial burden for the senior.

The regular expense of at-home care provokes the family to look into Medicare nursing homes. When considering Medicare and nursing homes, the senior and his or her family will see that many of the homes covered by Medicare are often hospital-like environments for seniors who aren't very agile physically or mentally. It suffices to say that a Medicare nursing home is not the ideal place for a senior who requires assistance but still enjoys some autonomy. At Sally's Residential Care Home, our senior lodgers receive around-the-clock care to avoid slip and fall accidents and to promote a general sense of wellness. Through placing the elderly adult with the trusted staff of Sally's Residential Care Home, the cost of living is more predictable. While Medicare for assisted living facilities might not be available, the safety offered at Sally's Residential Care Home prevents the accidents that would require Medicare involvement as well as out-of-pocket payments.
